Welcome & introduction

Chris Freeland
Director of Open Libraries, Internet Archive

Every forum has a different focus - build a community of practice around controlled digital lending
Controlled digital lending is a way that libraries can lend digital books based on their physical collections.

- The Open Libraries project was started from our strong belief that everyone deserves to learn.
- We want to offer up greatest digital library the internet has ever seen. To the world. For free.
- Our goal is to bring 4M modern books online
 - Why 4M? Size of a large metro public library
- We think that everyone, regardless of where they live, should have ready access to a great library.
- And we think it should be available on phones & devices that people turn to for information today
- We want to make sure that when people turn to their phones, they have access to the vetted, trusted information in libraries

In addition to being a digital library, Internet Archive is also a physical library - Internet Archive has been acquiring books. These are the basis for the books we lend. Because we have one physical copy of these 1.1M books, we can loan one digital copy to a user at a time.

Open Libraries

1.1M digital books for your patrons

The Open Libraries program empowers libraries to become digital libraries & serve their patrons where they live.

What if we could give Wikipedia editors access to the best online library possible? What if Wikipedia readers could dig deeper to the sources of information? Our goal is to turn all Wikipedia citations blue--by linking them to the actual sources. Turns out we've already started.

Need to make more things digital to weave them into the web

We excel at reformatting - turning analog into digital

And we are ramping up...

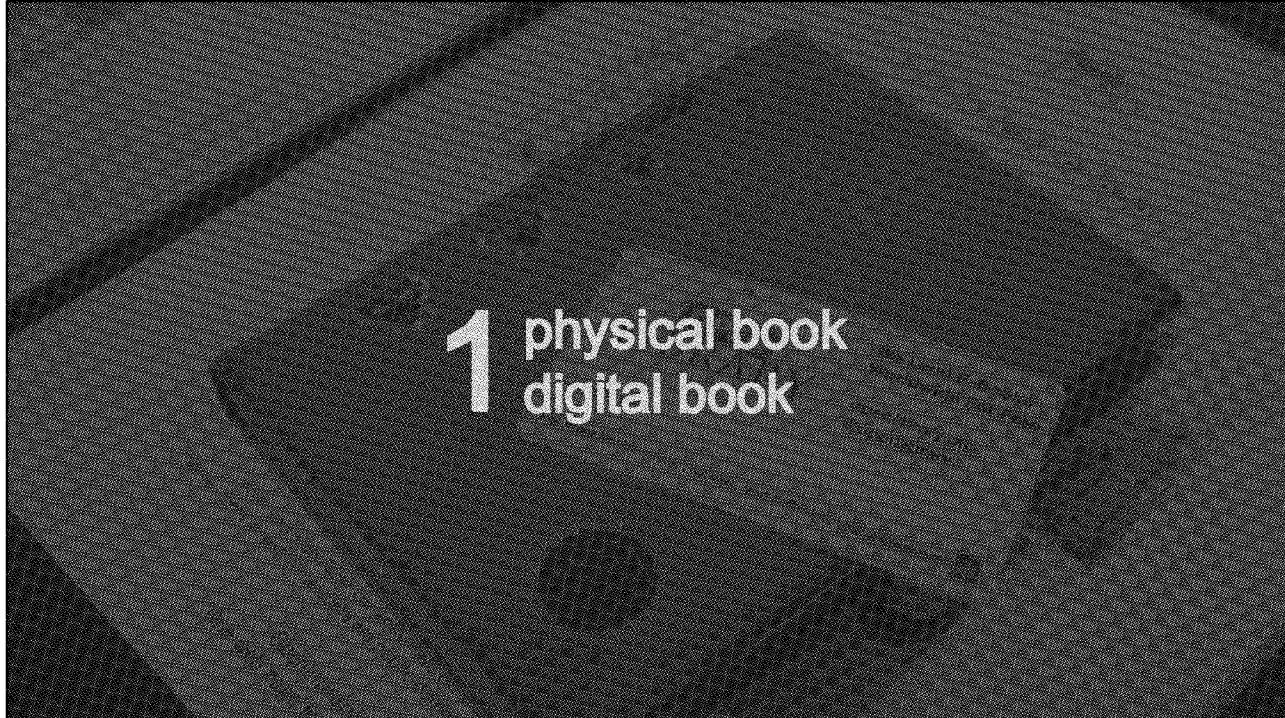

And it's not just libraries. Even Amazon reflects this chasm between 1923 and the eBooks era. How do we discover the out-of-print books. Orphan works. The important books that are missing online today? They are sitting in our libraries.
